BLUE LION MANUFACTURING (PTY) LTD v NATIONAL BRANDS LTD

SUPREME COURT OF APPEAL

HARMS JA, SCHUTZ JA, ZULMAN JA, CAMERON JA and MTHIYANE JA

2001 May 11, 18 Case No 286/2000

Trade and competition—Trade—Passing-off—Get-up of goods—Parties producing coconut biscuits under names of 'Tennis' and 'Tea Lovers' respectively—Packaging of 'Tea Lovers' alleged to have been changed to pass off 'Tennis' biscuits' packaging—Having regard to whole get-up, including colours, arrangements of matter and letters, there was immediate and striking similarity between rival packagings—That being so if one compared them side by side—Same could be said if they were displayed in quantity on supermarket shelf—Facts that participant in market chose to imitate competitor's get-up and then sought to maintain its imitation, suggested that it believed and had confirmation of its belief that imitation conferred on it some advantage that original get-up would not—Inference properly drawn that makers of 'Tea Lovers' had such belief—Basis for drawing inference strengthened by explanation or lack of explanation for manner in which it changed wrapping of its biscuits from that formerly in use to one in issue—Attempt not to distinguish but rather to confuse two products demonstrated.

The respondent had been selling coconut biscuits under the name of Tennis biscuits for a number of years. In 1990 it had altered the shape of it packaging, but reverted to the previous size in July 1998. The packaging, although in different sizes, was similar in appearance. Before July 1998 the appellant had changed its Tea Lovers biscuits' packaging to one which the respondent alleged was an impermissible copy of theirs. The similarities were a lustrous white background, a baker logo on the top left corner, a scatter of biscuits (using the same colour) on the right side and similar lettering in both of the two marks used on the packaging. The respondent had applied for and obtained an interdict in a Provincial Division restraining the appellant from using the packaging it was using. The respondent had, inter alia, used the evidence of one customer who had been confused by the similarities in packaging and had further sought to prove that the appellant had acted fraudulently. Although the appellant had been requested by the respondent to reveal its instructions to its design agency, its so-called job bag, the appellant had declined to do so, as it was irrelevant. In an appeal,

Held, that when one had regard to the whole get-up, including the colours, the arrangements of matter and the letters, there was an immediate and striking similarity between the rival packagings, whether one looked at the longer or the shorter of the respondent's packs when making the comparison. That was so if one compared them side by side. The same could be said if they were displayed in quantity on a supermarket shelf. (Paragraph [8] at 889D–E.)

Held, further, that, even if the respondent's witness was alone, she had fallen into a trap into which many a careful person might have fallen. (Paragraph [9] at 890B–C.)

Held, further, that the facts that a participant in a market chose to imitate its competitor's get-up and then sought to maintain its imitation suggested that it believed and had had confirmation of its belief that imitation A conferred on it some advantage that an original get-up would not. The inference should properly have been drawn that the appellant had such a belief and also knew that the job bag would have revealed that it was sailing as close to the wind as it thought it could. The basis for drawing this inference was strengthened by the appellant's explanation or lack of explanation for the manner in which it changed the wrapping of its biscuits, B in 1998, from that formerly in use to the one in issue in this case. (Paragraphs [14] and [15] at 891A/B–C/D.)

Held, further, that it had been demonstrated that there had been an attempt not to distinguish the appellant's mark from the respondent's but rather to confuse the two. (Paragraph [19] at 892C/D–E.)

Held, accordingly, that the likelihood of deception and confusion had been C established. (Paragraph [20] at 892G.)
